Putting the Pieces Together

Koury Sheraton Convention
Center, Greensboro NC
October 6-7, 2011

North Carolina budget numbers are out, and again, the educational budget has been reduced at the same time enrollment is increasing. Community colleges across the state are being asked to do more with less, an increasingly familiar mantra.

At the same time, the face of developmental education in North Carolina is undergoing a fundamental overhaul that will change the structure of the standard course and classroom setting. The Developmental Education Initiative teams are working to streamline content into focused courses that remove the repetition in the traditional model and only deliver information needed by the students.

As developmental educators, the questions arise, "How will this affect my classes? How do I make all of these pieces fit together to ensure the best quality education for my students? How can I deliver the best education possible with limited resources and changing criteria?"

Join NCADE, the most relevant professional venue for developmental educators, on Thursday and Friday, October 6 and 7, at Koury Sheraton Convention Center, Greensboro, NC, for professional and classroom resources information, and discussion to help guide you through the upcoming changes.
